The trial excited great attention on acount of the singular crew and the monstrous nature of their crimes. The death of the officers did less to rouse the prejudice of the public and to influence the jury than the callous murder of the unoffending Chinaman. The great difficulty was that of apportioning the blame amongst so many men and of determining which had really been active in the shedding of blood. Taffer, the mate; Early, the ship's boy; Candereau, the Frenchman, and Anderson, the carpenter, all gave their evidence, some incriminating one and some another. After a very careful exception of Watto, who came from the Levant. The oldest of the prisoners was t only five and twenty years of age. They took their sentence in a perfectly callous fashion and immediately before it was pronounced Leon and Watto laughed heartily because Duranno had forgotten the statement he had intended to make. One of the prisoners, who had been condemned to imprisonment, was at once heard to express a hope that he might be allowed to have Blance's boots.

The sentence of the law was carried out in front of Newgate upon the 22d of February. Five ropes jerked convulsively for an instant and the tragedy of the Flowery Land had reached its fitting consummation.

"They are from the Philippine Islands, answered. "We call them Manila men, for that's the port they all hall from. You'll find them good enough seamen. Mr. Karswell. I'll answer for it that they work well." "I'll answer for it, too," said the big mate, with an ominous clenching of his great red fist.

Karswell was hard put to it to establish any order amongst the strange material with which he had to work. Taffer, the second mate, was a mild young man, a good seaman and a pleasant companion, but hardly rough enough to bring this unruly crew to heel. Karswell must do it or it would never be done. The others he could manage, but the Manila men were dangerous.
